Biographical sketch/information

Charles Hammond Gibson, Jr., known as "Charlie", was the second child and only son of Charles Hammond Gibson and Rosamond Warren Gibson. He grew up at 137 Beacon Street. After leaving home in his late teens, Charlie returned to his childhood home in 1934 to take care of his mother who died later that year. In 1936, after taking a road trip, he returned to Boston and began preserving 137 Beacon Street as a Victorian-era historic house museum. Gibson died at the age of eighty in 1954.

Scope and Content

The Charles Hammond Gibson, Jr. Personal Papers Collection contains a variety of contemporaneous ephemera which collected by Gibson himself. Most of the extant correspondence revolves around business and, especially, his time as Parks Commissioner for Boston, rather than pertaining to anything truly personal. Other material includes a variety of pamphlets, receipts, advertisements, and cookbooks, including Mrs. Winslow's Domestic Receipt Book for.... which was published yearly. (There are several dates in the collection.) The material in this collection provides a deeper look into the interests of and business conducted by Gibson throughout his life while keeping Gibson's private life private.

Related Materials

Although not part of this collection directly, the archives holds a collection of Gibson's date books which may be of interest to researchers.
